Mr Pathon was a 44 years old gentleman. Living in USA, he was brought to U.K at Arabic Medical Centre on 08 June, 2006 complaining of sudden onset of severe headache, vomiting, diplopia and inability to stand. At the casualty, he lost his consciousness and he went into deep coma. He had a history of hypertension disease, and he was on treatment.

An urgent intubation was performed, and artificial ventilation was started. Then he was taken to the radiological department for urgent Brain CT scan and Brain MRI; both showed a massive intracerebral acute hemorrhage from a deep seated AVM at the perisylvian area. His neurological status deteriorated rapidly.

I was called by the Intensive Care Unit doctor at 8.30 PM on the same day - one hour after the admission, informing me about the case and told me that one of his pupils became fixed and dilated. He was given a high dose Mannitol and Lasix till my arrival 30 minutes later.

I examined the patient and reviewed his Brain MRI and Brain CT images, which confirmed the diagnoses of the ruptured Arteriovenous malformation with midline Li. occipital opercular hemorrhage and severe mass effect. I was told by the doctor in charge that the other pupil became fixed and dilated, just 5 minutes before my arrival, and all signs of brain death were there, but the definite diagnosis of brain death was questionable. So we discussed the surgical intercession with the relatives who were available to try to save his life, and they insisted to go for surgery.

Urgent surgery was performed immediately, evacuation of the hematoma through a big craniotomy opening was performed, and the huge bleeding AVM was resected.

Postoperatively, he didn't show any recovery signs except decortication responsive to deep sympathetic pain, and we continued to ventilate him artificially without any sedation.

Few days later, on 10 June, 2008, all his brain stem reflexes became absent, and all signs of brain death were there. On 14 June, 2008, Brain CT scan was done upon the request of the family, it showed a massive brain tissue accretion of the left hemisphere causing severe mass effect. We re-operate upon the patient hoping to postoperatively gain some improvement upon family request and in spite of the absence of all brain stem reflexes. But he didn't show any recovery and a diagnosis of the brain death was confirmed. He was continued to be ventilated artificially till the family transferred him to King Hussein Medical Centre on 25 June, 2008 for financial reasons, and the hospital fees were not paid.
